TSH is a glycoprotein hormone which produces cell-mediated immune responses in the thyroid gland. In the rat, the only known source of TSH is the pituitary. TSH is delivered to the thyroid via the circulation. Thyroid cells synthesize it locally. Purified TSH (bovine) has been successfully used for the treatment of different thyroid diseases like myxoedema or Graves Disease. This treatment is associated with transient thyroid stimulation, which is needed to reach thyroid hormone levels comparable to the untreated hypothyroid state. The TSH preparation used in the therapy is rather expensive. As a consequence, the daily administration of the hormone preparation has to be performed in close temporal relationship with, and under the control of, an experienced physician. It is even more difficult to adjust the dosage during the therapy with the constant variations of the hormone levels in the circulation and pituitary gland. An alternative to the use of pituitary derived bovine TSH in patients with hypothyroidism is the recombinant production of TSH in heterologous expression systems. Such attempts to produce human TSH in E. coli have failed so far due to insolubility of the protein, difficulties in refolding, proteolytic degradation, or low yield. The TSH preparation to be used in the therapy must meet different criteria. It must be able to restore the thyroid hormone levels in hypothyroid patients, without causing hyperthyroidism. It must be fully active for all the patients treated, and have the highest possible biological potency. Furthermore, it must be produced on the most cost efficient scale. A successful expression system for TSH would greatly enhance the quality of medical care for hypothyroid patients. Therefore, it is an object of the present invention to provide a TSH preparation for use in the treatment of hypothyroidism. The preparation is high active, stable, easy to isolate, and thus inexpensive. UFC heavyweight champion Cain Velasquez appears to have reached a settlement in the lawsuit he filed against Electronic Arts over his refusal to fight "UFC Undisputed 2010" champion Brock Lesnar. Velasquez had filed the suit last fall, saying the UFC and EA had attempted to force him to fight Lesnar (a non-title match) following the conclusion of "UFC Undisputed 2009," and that his refusal to engage in an illegal negotiation was protected under the Sherman Antitrust Act. EA issued a
